Landscape Architecture is a discipline that studies the way in which we design and plan the environments in which humans live. The landscape is a complex adaptive system involving interactions among cultural, social, environmental, ecological, political, technological, perceptual and aesthetic agents. Urban environments and places of everyday living are a consequence of intentional design interventions. An understanding of this process and the outcomes is not only important for designers, but for all people to be able to engage their environments fully in productive lives. This minor would open up an exciting career option to our diverse body of undergraduate students at UNM. The 18 credit hour minor covers a set of topics, theoretical positions and skills that offer students in all disciplines an opportunity to better understand the world in which they live.
